An introduction from the editor

This yearbook is organized in a chronological way. You won't find spreads organized by topic, like by sports teams or clubs. Instead, each page (with some exceptions) represents a single week. The resulting spreads are an eclectic collection of topics all around Bloomington High School North. This is the school year as we experienced it: one week at a time.

We live in a time of change and uncertainty. Things we regarded as normal are changing at the federal, state, and local levels. Incidents of political violence across the country serve as one example. Another example, this one local, is the financial struggle our school district is facing as a result of declining student enrollment and Indiana legislation's new property tax relief bill.

Each day, in and outside of school, we're trying to find who we are as people. I believe this happens with groups of people as well: friend groups, clubs, sports teams, and the entirety of North are all finding their individual identities within a larger community.

The idea this book aims to represent is that we are living and learning during these uncertain times. Hopefully, if we did our job, through the actions and words of our fellow students, these pages represent the humanity, resilience, and hope that we strive to hold towards the future.

Showing up is half the battle. Every row of the North student section is full at a football game against South. Quinn Wason (10) said, "Being there and making memories with friends is really nice."

Pull your weight. Seniors compete in tug-of-war against teachers and staff during the Fall Pep Rally. Olivia Voris (11) said the atmosphere was "hyped [and] loud."
